

Key Progenitors in Ulrich Dueck's

West Prussian Mennonite Genealogy Charts, Numbers 131-227

by D. Frederick Dyck*

This third installment of key progenitors of Ulrich Dueck's charts, numbers 131-277, marks the half-way point in this project of making an index of all 454 charts. The two previous installments were published in Mennonite Family History in October 2009 and April 2011.

In the first installment, I provided background on Ulrich Dueck and his charts and how this project evolved. The second installment provided additional information about the charts, the availability of data from the charts on the internet, and a few corrections to the first installment.

The chart (#047) reproduced in this third installment on pages 132-133 is representative of Ulrich Dueck's charts, about 11x17 inches in size. All the charts are handwritten. The particular chart in this issue is one that I would term a "primary" chart because the people listed are on many subsequent charts as key progenitors. The dates on chart #047 are also some of the oldest in Ulrich's charts.

It is extremely difficult to trace West Prussian Mennonite genealogy back to dates older than these shown on chart #047, the early to mid-17th century. The Danzig Mennonite Church was the only formal church in West Prussia prior to the mid-1700s, and its records do not generally predate ca 1650 except for elders' names and dates of service.

Records of Mennonite churches in West Prussia for births, baptisms, marriages, and deaths have been available in back issues of Mennonite Family History for many years. Most of these records were made accessible through the efforts of Adalbert Goertz, longtime contributing editor of Mennonite Family History, and now deceased.

As always, I welcome any comments or questions regarding this ongoing project.

Heubuden (Pomeranian Voivodeship, Poland)

Heubuden, once known as Hejbody and now known as Stogi, is located approximately seven kilometres (four miles) northwest of Malbork (Marienburg) and 40 km. (25 mi.) southeast of the regional capital Gdańsk (Danzig). In 2012, it was a village in the administrative district of Gmina Malbork, within Malbork County, Pomeranian Voivodeship (Province).

Heubuden was a village in the former Free City of Danzig, three miles northwest of Marienburg, the seat of the former Mennonite congregation Heubuden-Marienburg, which was the largest rural congregation of East Germany. In 1929, the membership was 1,092 besides 358 children under 15. The members were mostly farmers and owned a total of over 25,000 acres. Most of them lived in the southern part of the Gross-Werder, a smaller part in Marienburg and east of the Nogat in former West Prussia, and several at Dirschau (Tczew) west of the Vistula on Polish territory. The ancestors were almost exclusively Dutch immigrants. In 1565, there were in the area of Heubuden some Mennonite renters who were making their payments to the Koczelitzki. Until the middle of the 17th century, the congregation apparently had no preacher and was served by the ministers of other congregations, especially Danzig. In 1662, Herrenhagen was settled. Mennonite settlers with hereditary leases settled on the former estates of the Teutonic Knights such as Leske, Diebau, Kaminke, Kalthof, Klein-Montau, Sandhof, Laase, and Schroop; similarly on lands owned by Marienburg in Dammfelde and Stadtfelde; they also purchased pieces of land in the freikölmisch villages or bought new estates on lands farther removed from the villages. So there were at a very early time Mennonites in Koczelitzki, Altenau, Klein-Lesewitz, Halbstadt, Tralau, Lichtenau, Simonsdorf, Gnojau, Kunzendorf, Altmünsterberg, Mielenz, Schönau, and Wernersdorf.

The manager of the estate belonging to the Marienburg castle about 1584 settled a number of immigrants from Brabant and Schottland on the estate lands. Among them there were some Mennonites. Upon the complaints of the citizens and the command of Sigismund III, these were denied all civil rights; but the manager in spite of manifold objections from the citizens settled craftsmen and tradesmen here again and again. Especially after 1672 the lowlands around the castle were settled by foreign, particularly Mennonite, tavernkeepers, Höcker, and craftsmen. In Kalthof the manager rented out lands owned by the city and permitted Mennonite potters and merchants to set up business there; thus in 1767 a Mennonite established a vinegar distillery. In the Werder gristmills were built, the oldest ones in 1747 at Koczelitzki and Leske. In 1748 the city of Marienburg leased the castle lowlands, and the Mennonites were now given the rights of citizenship. Frequently the delegates at the various Landtags protested against toleration of the Mennonites. As late as 1700 a resolution was drawn up forbidding Mennonite meetings in the Vorschloss (a street in Marienburg) and in the castle warehouse.

The Mennonite worship services were not public. In the 17th century they likely sang little at their meetings; but they had hymnbooks such as van Mander's Gulden Harpe. In 1724 and 1752, Dutch hymnbooks were printed at Amsterdam for the Prussian congregations. After the beginning of the 18th century there was singing at their meetings, the singing conducted by a chorister. For their meetings they chose "either in the wintertime large rooms on the farms or in the summer good barns and large cow stables which were carefully cleaned and decorated with greenery. The preacher, when he preaches, sits on a high-backed chair and the hearers sit about him." "The preacher delivered his long address of two hours in the Dutch language seated and without an outline before him." It was the custom that each sermon was delivered on three Sundays. Already in 1671, Georg Hansen wrote that the youth could read German better than Dutch; nevertheless the Dutch language remained in use until 1750-60.
